"Allow me to introduce my colleagues," The Eidolon Adrift says. "The Radiant Emissary." They gesture to the Jovian. "Or a portion of them, at least. Projecting their full self is unnecessary and..."

"Bulky," the Martian cuts in. "I am the Ashborn General. You may have heard of me."

You swallow. You have, indeed. The Ashborn General is a Martian legend. She once conquered most of the solar system—thankfully, back before Earth was a tempting target. Then, according to the stories, she had a moral awakening, declared the concept of empire to be evil, and waged a seventeen-year war to beat back her own people. Mars didn't venture past their own planet for a century, after that. You assumed she was dead, given that it all occurred a millennium ago.

"And the plant is the Penumbral Sage," the General finishes. The Eidolon Adrift tilts their mask in her direction, with what you imagine might be a withering stare, if you could see it.

"We sensed the death of our Arbiter," the Eidolon hiss-whispers. "A pity. He served us well. He judged you a worthy and necessary successor. We are here to decide for ourselves whether that is the case. So tell us: what do you believe we should do about you?"

- "We have the same goal. I think we should work together."
- "I don't want anything to do with this Arbiter business."
- "I can't answer that until I know what it is you really want on Earth."
